

SUMMARY

Nowadays, England and Wales are minority Christian countries, meanwhile Leicester and Birmingham have “minority majorities”.

Christian followers have decreased and Islam followers increased. Moreover, it is common not to follow any religion. It is astonishing the diversity among the state.

All that makes the Church, who is hopeful, have a big task: trust that God will build his kingdom on Earth and make Christ known but the number of believers has greatly decreased.

The Office for National Statistics (ONS) cited different patterns of aging, fertility, mortality and migration as possible reasons for the change in the religious profile of countries.

Now we live in a new era of "super diversity" across the cities, people now belong to minority ethnic groups.

Jon Wroth-Smith, said the figures showed "the increasingly multicultural society in which we live."

Furthermore, the current United Kingdom is not considered Christian anymore because the data picked up shows that most of the English population does not follow that religion, so humanists and secularists claim to reconsider the role of the Church of England. Afterall, human beings live in a values-driven society which is getting better every day and, combining ethics and reason, we can spread this social purpose to the world.